Kevin Lynch (1918-1989) is a pre-eminent figure in urban design of the twentieth century. about several significant projects that were created in London in the twenties of the last century. In particular, about one construction that was called the "Palace of Light" - "overuse, unfinished forms", which involved "a bunch of people, sewing machines, mast machines, old carpentry tools and shelf sets, planers and unfilled polyurethane boards." Completely here: The heyday of "high" architecture in the USSR from M.F. Posokhin to B. Iofan: from 17 to 1950 [Unfortunately, in the collection of the RSL were completely lost (books on the topic "Architecture of the USSR. The second half of the 20s", M., 1982 and "Soviet Art. Architecture of the USSR in the 20-30s." M., 1978) two graphic works by B. Iofan, in which he took part in the creation of the project of the Palace of Soviets. Meanwhile, these works are among the most interesting (and, at the same time, the most destructive!) of his projects and testify not only to the extraordinary talent of the architect, but also to those grandiose, truly titanic efforts that were needed to make the building such as the architect intended. These works can be called the pinnacle of Soviet architecture in the period from the Moscow Olympics to the early 40s - an action that is repeated in the work of other Soviet architects at the turn of the decade, being a distinct dominant of all Soviet architecture and remaining so until the very end of the Great Patriotic War. Although the most successful in this sense, in our opinion, are not implemented projects, but their conceptual developments, which made it possible to see the future silhouette of the building and develop it in a bold and decisive direction. In subsequent years, architectural propaganda began in the USSR, which gave rise to many projects
