-Shaw, [B62]). These are not just the detached products of forgetfulness but are truly thought out reconstructions of the past. Knowledge involves something more than memory; knowledge involves the formation of real intentions and the application of the right reasons. This is why the believer has the same need to reconstruct the past as the non-believer in a dream. Thus, the "A-Taffin myth" suggests that dreaming and belief are grounded in similar mechanisms. In addition to semantic memory and episodic memory (the former the ability to recall facts about the past and the latter the ability to remember particular past experiences), there is a third type of memory which I suggest is unique to those who believe that a particular god exists. This is introspective knowledge and the ability to reconstruct past experiences and intentions. While epistemology typically considers all three types of memory as separate and distinct processes, in the case of belief, it would appear that they are all interfaced in the same manner. I am, of course, aware that I am making a number of assumptions and proposing that my argument proceeds in this way is primarily to suggest that, if the A-Taffin myth is correct, an assessment of what it means to believe is reducible to an assessment of what it means to dream. This is not to say that the development of beliefs is the same as the development of dreams or that the formation of beliefs is the same as the formation of dreams; nor is it to suggest that the formation of beliefs would not be affected by particular neurological conditions (Rasmussen et al., [B46]) or amnesic disorders (Gisquet-Verrier, [B15]) which affect dream formation. What it is to suggest is that dream and belief are so similar that one cannot understand or explain belief in terms of dream alone. ANGRY diners torched a McDonald's in Melbourne's north-west before threatening police and wandering around the city armed with knives. Shoppers found burning debris and broken glass at the restaurant in Deer Park at about 6pm yesterday after anti-social youths broke in and set light to the building. Police said the angry "adolescent and his friends" were armed with knives and pushed a customer in the face at one stage. Inspector Paul Armstrong said the group of teenagers went through the restaurant cleaning off the graffiti on the walls. "They were there for about 90 minutes, causing damage, loitering and breaching the peace while sporting weapons, including knives," he said. "Police are satisfied that these actions were entirely unprovoked." Police said the group fled the scene but police and emergency services were alerted to the fire. The 17-year-old arrested was taken to a regional police station for questioning and appeared in Footscray Youth Court on Monday. "It appears that this teenager vandalised the restaurant, they set it alight and then they ran," Inspector Armstrong said. Early-onset periodontitis (EOP) is defined as a manifestation of periodontal disease associated with the presence of at least 4 sites with clinical attachment loss of at least 3 mm, and no evidence of any other disease or condition that could explain the clinical findings. [1][2] Early-onset periodontitis is an age-dependent and primarily a genetically influenced disease. [3] EOP is more common in Black and Hispanic females. [4] Several factors may predispose an individual to EOP, including sex, ethnicity, environmental risk factors, and the inherited susceptibility to both host and pathogen factors. [5] EOP is most commonly associated with the loss of connective tissue attachment to the root surface, leading to an apical shift of the junctional epithelium. [6] The biochemical changes in the attachment apparatus and the periodontal ligament during the progression of periodontitis have been determined previously by biochemical and immunohistochemical methods. [6][7][8] It has been clearly demonstrated that fibroblasts and collagen synthesis in the periodontal ligament and the attachment apparatus decrease during
